CHAPTER IV
CONCLUSION

During my internship, I had a problem of handling a student who distracted the class. The problem has two causes. The first cause is Alfi was self-centered. The second cause is the mother spoilt the student. Moreover, the problem has three effects. The first effect is the class became noisy. The second effect is it was difficult for the teacher to give equal attention to the other students. The third effect is the other students would be angry at him because the student always distracted the class. The potential solutions I propose are asking the help from his parents, separating him from the other students by telling him to sit in front of the white board, and making the lesson interesting by having games after the class.

The best solution to handle the student who distracts the class is to apply all the potential solutions. At first, I need to ask for information and the help from the parents. It can help me to know the personality of the student, as stated by Quinn that talking to the child's family member is needed because the teacher can know the child's personality (34). In some of the lessons I will separate Alfi from the other students, especially when there are quiet activities such as written exercises and reading so that the class becomes manageable, as Martin says that by keeping the easily- distracted student away from other students can make the environment in the classroom conducive (15). As it is not suggested that Alfi be separated from other students everytime during the lessons, I will use games to make the lesson interesting. By having games after the lesson, I can motivate the student to finish his work quickly.

14

Handling and teaching a student who distracts the class are not easy. Therefore, I would like to suggest that those who want to do the internship in the teaching field to be creative by making the lesson interesting by giving games after the lesson and always ask the help from the students' parents to find the best way to handle the student and also separate him from other students .

Maranatha Christian University