

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSION

In the previous chapter, I have discussed the causes and effects of my problem, which is the difficulty in managing a class in which some of the students are my friends. The causes of this problem are I was too close with the students as their friends; several of them were even my friends when I was a student there so they knew my bad habits, and several students in the class often shared their life story with me. The problem affected the process of teaching and learning. I was not being respected by the students. Several of them ignored me. Many of the students asked me to manipulate their marks. It also made me unable to give clear instructions to the class. I have also analyzed several potential solutions that would be suitable to solve this problem, with their positive and negative potential effects.

After I analyzed each potential solution and potential positive and negative effects of each solutions, I choose the combination of the second and the third potential solution as the best solutions. To solve my problem, I have to talk first to the students outside the class at the beginning of the semester that I need them to understand my position, then I also have to be more relaxed in teaching and not be too strict with the students.

I do not choose the first potential solution, which is I have to be strict and disciplined with the students, because I think I will not enjoy the teaching and learning process. Besides, I will be too nervous to teach the students. I also will not choose only the second potential solution, which is talking to the students outside the class and asking them to understand my position, because it will be useless if the students can understand me but I am not able to manage the class well. There is also a disadvantage if the third potential solution stands alone. Maybe I can manage the class well, but I will lose respect from my students.

That is why I choose the combination of the second and the third potential solutions to solve my problem. I choose them as my solution because I think these are the most suitable solutions for my problem. These solutions can make me concentrate better on teaching and I still can have fun while teaching. After talking to the students that I am going to teach them and ask for their understanding about my role in the classroom, I do not have to be worried about the students' opinion about me teaching them. Then, without having to be strict all the time, I still can improvise the way of teaching and still can have fun with the students in my class.

I still need to pay attention to several potential negative effects that might arise when I apply the potential solutions. If these combined solutions are applied, the students may still not understand my position as a teacher and make a distance from me, also I can lose the respect from the students and lose my concentration in teaching. To anticipate the effects, I still need to set rules for teaching, apply them to all of my students and also be consistent with the rules myself. I also need to prepare a lesson plan before hand so that I can anticipate any problems that may arise.
